

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

The Gazette for November is issued several days in advance of the almanac, and will doubtless command a hearty welcome from the lovers of agreeable and easy reading in form of a periodical miscellany. Among the original contributions in this number, we may take favorable note of a spirited military sketch by James Franklin Pitts, a characteristic little poem entitled "Surf," by E. C. Stedman, "most musical," though not "most melancholy," a graphic story of Southern life, by Mrs. W. H. Palmer, a philological excursion on "The Confusion of Tongues," containing several stupendous specimens of provincial dialects, by George Wakeman, and an essay, by L. J. Bigelow, on the "Aesthetics of Suicide," which the writer elevates to the dignity of one of the fine arts. In a deeper vein, and full of instructive suggestions, is the paper entitled "E Pluribus Unum," giving a popular view of the recent scientific theories in regard to the unitary forces of the universe. The editor's special department of "Nebulae" presents a readable collection of promiscuous gossip and criticism, which will be found both sound and toothsome.

LITERARY ITEMS.

The world-renowned well of St. Keyne, near Liskeard, in Cornwall, famous for its alleged power to confer prophecy on that one of a newly-married couple who first drinks of its waters, is in a sad state of neglect; the channel which supplies the marvelous waters is stopped, the bed of the fountain filled with dry stones. Of the five trees—an oak, three ashes and an elm—that were so strangely rooted together above the root of the fountain, two are dead, and one of them, and of the others, which was still procurable at a neighboring cottage, from the original spring. The fountain itself is, we are glad to learn, about to be restored to its recent character, so far as it is possible to do.

The Paris correspondent of a London newspaper relates that Eugene is very fond of novel-reading, and especially favors such tales as contain records of exciting adventure, courage and patience. "On the evening before she left Paris for Ilarritz, the Empress was absorbed in Edmund About's celebrated novel, 'Trente et Quarante,' and wholly preoccupied with the fate of Capt. Bitterlin, the most amusing personage of the action, when she suddenly turned to her husband and said, 'My dear About, I am very reluctantly, and not without expressing some regret, did the Empress lay aside the interesting volume to obey her lord and master. The next morning Her Majesty sent St. Cloud to Capt. Bitterlin's admiring son, and when he reached Ilarritz a telegraphic despatch was handed to her. It came direct from the Emperor, and only contained these words: 'Le Capitaine Bitterlin est mort!'

A recent number of the London periodical Notes and Queries contains a letter from the late Dr. Southwood Smith (necessarily printed now for the first time), with reference to the disposal of the body of Jeremy Bentham. The letter is dated June 14, 1857, and says: "Jeremy Bentham left by will his body to me for dissection. I was also to deliver a public lecture upon his body to medical students, and the general public. The lecture was to be at Newgate-street, Brougham, James Mill, Grote, and many other disciples of Bentham being present. After the usual anatomical demonstrations over the body, a skeleton was made of the bones. I endeavored to have a model of the skeleton made, but was unable to get it done, placing it under an air-pump over sulphuric acid. By this means the head was rendered as hard as the skulls of the New-Zelanders, but all expression was gone, of course. Seeing this would not do for exhibition. I had no objection to it, as I distinguished French students from David's last picture of Bentham's head and body. The artist succeeded in making one of the most admirable likenesses ever seen. ... I had the skeleton stuffed to fit Bentham's own clothes, and after the dissection a composite of singular and stirring save as something of the tenor of the lives of two good lives, we have one of his author's most readable creations."
